Princess Iman wore a dress by Jordanian designer Reema Dabbour to a henna party hosted by Queen Rania

In Dior gown and Chaumet tiara, Princess Iman of Jordan was walked down the aisle by her brother, Crown Prince Hussein

Fit for a princess

Embrace majestic opulence in the style of the royal Hashemite wedding traditions

It was maximum glamour when Princess Iman of Jordan, the eldest daughter of King Abdullah II and Queen Rania, wed Venezuelan venture capitalist Jameel Alexander Thermiotis at the Beit Al Urdun Palace in Amman. The bride looked to Dior for her high-neck gown with floral lace panelling, and reportedly to her grandmother for the loan of her Chaumet diamond diadem. A series of celebratory rites – including a henna party – created a captivating crescendo for the couple ahead of the vow-taking. When on the hunt for princess-ready paraphernalia, embrace confections of neutrals with aureate flourishes. Buccellati has all the lavish spectacle one could desire for statement high jewellery; and Dior and De Beers are currently bats about butterflies – a symbolic emblem for newlyweds' homeware and bijoux.
