Looking for a good restaurant in London? These are the favorite restaurants of our correspondent who knows the city inside out.

RH The Gallery in Mayfair

Usually, it is easy to categorize new London addresses into places to shop, restaurants where you can enjoy a good meal, spots with something exceptional to see, and hip rooftops where you can enjoy cocktails. However, RH The Gallery right in the heart of Mayfair has it all: it is a spacious showroom for the extraordinary interior collections of the American luxury label RH, but it is also a place where history comes to life.

The monumental building was designed as early as 1723 by the prominent architect Giacomo Leoni, a pioneer of English Palladianism. The aristocratic residence had various owners and was eventually acquired by the Bank of England, one of the oldest central banks in the world. For its repurposing into RH The Gallery, the prestigious architectural firm Foster & Partners was commissioned, and they spent over five years renovating it.

Why is this address now listed here among our favorite restaurants? Well, because, in addition to the interior objects and the rich history, I am personally most impressed by the hospitality businesses that have been housed here. The Dining Room is a luxurious restaurant in the former bank hall where gigantic glass chandeliers descend between Roman columns about eight meters high. Particularly impressive.

But my favorite spot in this gigantic building is without a doubt The Perch: a cozy rooftop bar designed by British designer Anouska Hempel, who furnished the bar with large glass birdcages. Enjoy a glass of champagne or a cocktail here, and be sure to order the exquisite bites such as the lobster brioche or the fried artichoke.
